Reimagining Hindi for the Digital Age From Script to Silicon

A modern knowledge language must continually name and explain developments in science, technology, law, medicine, and media. Terminology must balance institutional precision with public accessibility across formal and conversational registers. The Department of Official Language supports this work through dictionaries, translation resources, terminology, and language technology emphasising clarity and suitable adoption of international terms. Hindi Shabd Sindhu, jointly developed with the Central Hindi Directorate since 2021, integrates vocabulary from Indian languages, dialects, and contemporary disciplines. Making such resources searchable, machine-readable, and reusable is now critical. Bharati Multilingual Translation

Dr. Shubhankar Mishra

India's linguistic plurality defines its civilizational character. The 2011 Census recorded 1,369 mother tongues and 121 languages spoken by at least 10,000 people. The Constitution recognises 22 languages in its Eighth Schedule, while 11 Indian languages have been accorded Classical Language status in recognition of their antiquity and literary heritage. Centuries of contact among Indo-Aryan, Dravidian, Austro-Asiatic, and Tibeto-Burman languages have created an interconnected linguistic continuum shaped by migration, cultural exchange, and borrowing.

Hindi evolved within this multilingual continuum. As an Indo-Aryan language, its historical development forms part of the broad transition from Old Indo-Aryan, represented principally by Sanskrit, through the Middle Indo-Aryan Prakrits and Apabhramṣa varieties to the New Indo-Aryan languages of northern India. This was neither a direct descent from Sanskrit nor a single, linear progression. Modern Standard Hindi was standardised primarily from Khari Boli, a Western Hindi variety associated with Delhi and western Uttar Pradesh that gained literary, educational, and administrative prominence during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Hindi's script followed a related but distinct evolution. Devanagari developed from the wider Nagari tradition and served several languages before becoming closely associated with modern Hindi. Institutions such as the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, founded in Varanasi in 1893, promoted the script and strengthened Hindi's literary, educational, and public use.

Hindi's technological journey represents a further stage in this continuing evolution. Its movement from manuscripts to print and typewriters required Devanagari's vowel signs, reordered marks, and conjunct characters to be adapted to mechanical systems. Computers, the internet, smartphones, machine translation, and artificial intelligence have since transformed how Hindi is written, circulated, and accessed.

Hindi Diwas celebrated on 14 September every year, therefore commemorates not a fixed linguistic inheritance but a living continuum of adaptation. In the digital age, Hindi must participate fully in the knowledge economy through machine-readable resources, representative datasets, interoperable platforms, and reliable AI. Its future depends on preserving its historical depth while enabling new generations to learn, create, communicate, and access knowledge through it.

Indian-Language Computing and Encoding

Although computing entered India in the 1950s, adapting it to Indian scripts became a major frontier by the 1980s. IIT Kanpur's Integrated Devanagari Computer terminal, developed through a Department of Electronics-sponsored project in 1983, contributed to GIST (Graphics and Intelligence based Script Technology). Early incompatible fonts and encodings obstructed exchange, search, and preservation. C-DAC's GIST programme advanced ISCII (Indian Script Code for Information Interchange), INSCRIPT, Optical Character Recognition (OCR), and speech technologies; the Bureau of Indian Standards later issued ISCII-1991.

Unicode subsequently assigned standardised code points independent of appearance. Fonts including Mangal, Nirmala UI, and Aparajita enabled consistent Devanagari rendering across platforms. Building on ISCII, Unicode made Hindi interoperable across operating systems, databases, websites, mobile devices, publishing, search, and archives, establishing infrastructure for natural language processing, translation, speech technologies, and AI.

Constitutional Mandate and Living Vocabulary

Articles 343–351 of Part XVII frame Hindi's technological future. Article 343 designates Hindi in Devanagari as the Union's Official Language; Article 351 directs the Union to promote and develop it as an expression of India's composite culture, enriched by Hindustani and Eighth Schedule languages. This mandate requires Hindi to acquire vocabulary for emerging knowledge and adapt to digital platforms, translation, and AI. The Constituent Assembly adopted Hindi in Devanagari on September 14, 1949; Hindi Diwas, first observed in 1953, commemorates that decision. World Hindi Day, observed on January 10 since 2006, commemorates the first World Hindi Conference in Nagpur in 1975 and highlights Hindi's global presence.

Facilitator Software and LILA (Learning Indian Languages through Artificial Intelligence) similarly extend language resources into translation, learning, and digital communication.

From Official Language to Digital Public Language

Hindi's administrative role now concerns whether citizens can interact digitally with the State, not merely whether official documents can use Hindi. An integrated ecosystem of search, OCR, speech recognition, text-to-speech, machine translation, conversational AI, and accessible interfaces must enable citizens to find information, understand services, ask questions, complete transactions, and exercise digital citizenship in Hindi.

Expanding Knowledge and Learning

Hindi's future depends on creating, evaluating, and sharing knowledge within a multilingual ecosystem in which languages complement one another. The National Education Policy 2020 advances Indian-language education, bilingual learning, quality resources, and technology-enabled multilingualism. Schools, universities, libraries, publishers, government bodies, researchers, and technology platforms must expand advanced Hindi resources in science, medicine, engineering, law, economics, computer science, and AI while strengthening academic writing and publishing.

Three Bharatiya Bhasha Samiti initiatives launched in 2024 illustrate this agenda. UGC-led ASMITA (Augmenting Study Materials in Indian Languages through Translation and Academic Writing) plans 22,000 books across 22 scheduled languages within five years. The Central Institute of Indian Languages leads Bahubhasha Shabdakosh, a multilingual dictionary repository, while the National Educational Technology Forum leads Real-time Translation Architecture for Bharatiya Bhasha. The Commission for Scientific and Technical Terminology, established in 1961, contributes terminology, glossaries, dictionaries, and university publications. Together with OCR, speech, publishing, and translation technologies, these initiatives can make Hindi a language not only of access but also of research and knowledge creation.

From Machine Translation to Multilingual AI

Translation technology has progressed from rule-based and statistical systems to neural machine translation, Transformers, and Large Language Models (LLMs), shifting from word substitution toward contextual processing. For Hindi, this transition can broaden access to education, science, medicine, law, governance, and technical knowledge. The National Translation Mission expands access to knowledge texts, particularly in higher education. AI4Bharat at IIT Madras develops datasets, models, and open-source tools; IIT Bombay's Project Udaan combines AI-assisted and human-supervised textbook translation. The Department of Official Language's Kanthasth 2.0, renamed Bharati-Bhasha Anuvad Sarthi, integrates translation memory, neural translation, voice typing, and an intelligent chatbot.

The National Language Translation Mission, implemented through Bhashini and launched on July 4, 2022, combines machine translation, automatic speech recognition, and text-to-speech across Indian languages. AICTE's Anuvadini supports AI-assisted academic, technical, and educational translation. These initiatives are creating scalable, interoperable language infrastructure.

Speed, however, cannot replace accuracy, fidelity, context, or domain sensitivity. Legal, medical, scientific, and educational texts require specialised terminology and interpretive conventions. Reliable translation needs machine-readable dictionaries, terminology databases, parallel corpora, curated domain datasets, and human evaluation. Generative AI may produce fluent Hindi while altering legal propositions, scientific concepts, or medical instructions. AI supplies scale and consistency; language experts assess linguistic and cultural suitability; domain specialists validate substance. Since 2023, generative AI has extended multilingual functions to summarisation, terminology assistance, question answering, and cross-lingual retrieval. Progress therefore depends less on model size alone than on diverse, representative resources that preserve meaning, context, and knowledge.

Hindi Beyond Devanagari

Young smartphone users effortlessly navigate Devanagari, Romanised Hindi, and English within single interactions. Hinglish, abbreviations, emojis, and voice notes constitute dynamic multilingual registers rather than necessarily linguistic decline. Although Devanagari remains central to formal communication, Romanised Hindi is prominent online. Language technologies must therefore accommodate scripts, Hinglish, regional varieties, and registers without sacrificing precision in legal, scientific, educational, or administrative settings. A grievance, lesson, research article, and casual conversation are not computationally identical. Hindi AI should be inclusive, adaptable, and sensitive to audience, purpose, and context.

From Digital Hindi to Hindi AI

Representative data underpin computational capability. The Linguistic Data Consortium for Indian Languages has curated Hindi resources including a 10,317,177-word gold-standard corpus, approximately 121 hours of raw speech from 488 speakers, and 72.5 hours of sentence-aligned speech from 473 speakers. These resources support speech recognition and language processing. Bhashini's participatory Bhasha Daan initiative collects speech, text, and translation data reflecting real-world use. Announced in the Union Budget 2025–2026, the Bharatiya Bhasha Pustak Pariyojana seeks to provide school and higher-education materials digitally in 22 Indian languages, expanding learning access and the technological knowledge base.

The IndiaAI Mission, launched in March 2024 with Rs. 10,372 crore, provides a national framework: more than 38,000 graphics processing units have been onboarded, 30 India-specific applications approved, and over 13,500 students and researchers supported. Twelve selected organisations and consortia are developing indigenous foundation models and LLMs using Indian data, languages, and contexts. AI Kosh, Safe & Trusted AI, and the India AI Governance Guidelines further support data infrastructure and responsible deployment. Quality at scale requires curated datasets capturing regional, social, and generational variation, including formal, conversational, Romanised, and code-switched Hindi.

Industry and the Digital Ecosystem

Public initiatives and market demand jointly drive Hindi's digital growth. The IAMAI-Kantar "Internet in India 2025" report recorded 958 million active users, including approximately 548 million rural users (57%). Moreover, 44% had used AI-enabled features such as voice or image search, chatbots, and filters, while 588 million (61%) consumed short videos. Cinema, streaming, YouTube, podcasts, publishing, gaming, creator platforms, and digital storytelling increasingly shape how younger people use Hindi. Google, Microsoft, Meta, Samsung, and Apple have expanded Hindi search, AI, translation, speech, accessibility, and content tools, enabling users to consume, search, speak, translate, create, and interact.

Commercial investment alone cannot address education, governance, cultural preservation, or low-resource varieties. Sustainability requires industry scale, public infrastructure, academic research, and language-community participation.

This ecosystem must connect resources that remain fragmented across institutions and platforms. Common standards, governed datasets, interoperable application programming interfaces, and evaluation would allow research outputs to become public tools. Evaluation should measure not only benchmark accuracy but also performance across dialects, scripts, domains, age groups, and accessibility needs. Public procurement can encourage systems that protect privacy, disclose limitations, and permit independent auditing. Universities can train linguists, translators, subject specialists, and engineers to work collaboratively, while communities can identify exclusions and contribute authentic usage. Long-term preservation is important: born-digital material, digitised manuscripts, terminology collections, speech archives, and contemporary online expression require durable formats and reliable metadata. Coordinating these elements would convert scattered innovation into linguistic infrastructure, reduce duplicated effort, and ensure that Hindi technologies serve citizens consistently rather than only users of commercially attractive applications.

The Road Ahead: Kartavya Path

Hindi's future lies not in replacing English but in a multilingual knowledge ecosystem. English will connect India to global science, while Hindi, other Indian languages, and tribal languages can advance research, education, public discourse, and locally grounded knowledge. Four principles should guide Hindi's technological development: inclusion, interoperability, accuracy, and public value. AI must represent, rather than erase, formal and colloquial registers, regional varieties, Devanagari and Roman scripts, and Hindi-English code-switching.

Voice technologies, accessible interfaces, and low-bandwidth tools can widen participation. Awadhi, Braj, Bhojpuri, Rajasthani, other varieties, and tribal languages also need documentation, digital representation, and technological support. India's linguistic diversity is a national knowledge resource, not a constraint. Technology can distribute information, but language makes it intelligible and meaningful. The ambition must exceed digitising Hindi: Hindi should become knowledge-ready, technology-ready, and future-ready—a language through which people dream, learn, research, create, communicate, govern, and imagine the future.
